
Missing link still missing for evolutionists

Dear Editor,

Allow me to borrow from Ronald Reagan and say, "There you go again!" The media has been busy making sure everyone is aware that a skull has been found in Africa that proves man has evolved from apes. But don't throw away your Bible just yet, we've heard this before.

Every so often a new discovery makes front-page news, but a few months later we find that the fossil is not what it was originally purported to be. The missing link is still missing.

Remember the feathered dinosaur that proved dinosaurs evolved into birds, which later turned out to be a hoax? My favorite was the archeologist in Japan with the uncanny knack for locating fossils until he was caught burying them himself. I think evolutionists are so desperate to find just one verifiable transitional fossil that perhaps some of them are too quick to support these fakes. It must be very frustrating for someone who has put their faith in the theory of evolution; more than 100 million fossils have been found and still not one proven transitional fossil.

Sooner or later this latest find will be disproved like all the others. If you should miss it, don't worry. Just keep reading the letters to the editor and, Lord willing, I will be around to point it out to you.

Robert J. Rani
Rochester
